TACO CHELO

Taco Chelo is a collaboration between Phoenix chef/restaurateur Aaron Chamberlin, chef Suny Santana and artist Gennaro Garcia, and the latter's influence permeates every bit of the space, from a Frida Kahlo wall painting near the entrance to the marigold ceiling with exposed wooden beams and pendant lights with Moroccan vibes.

There's nothing complicated about the menu, which includes botanas (snacks) of chips, salsa and guacamole ($3.50); chicharrones ($3.75); a quesadilla ($2.25 for cheese; add meat or veggies for $1-$1.50 extra); and frijoles a la charra, pinto beans stewed with bacon and topped with pico de gallo ($3). They're all delicious and inexpensive, so you can order all of them without feeling bad about your tab. The guacamole is especially yummy, so consider ordering a double or triple of that one. There are two salads ($6.95 each), and they're yummy, but who orders salad at happy hour? Head straight to the tacos section for seasonal vegetable, fish, carnitas, carne asada and beef barbacoa street tacos, all served with grilled onions, cucumbers, lime and salsa on the side ($3-$3.50). Like all street tacos, they're small, but one or two will hit the spot if you've already primed your panza with botanas.
